WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

 Thunderstorms Northern and Eastern areas through Early Wednesday *****

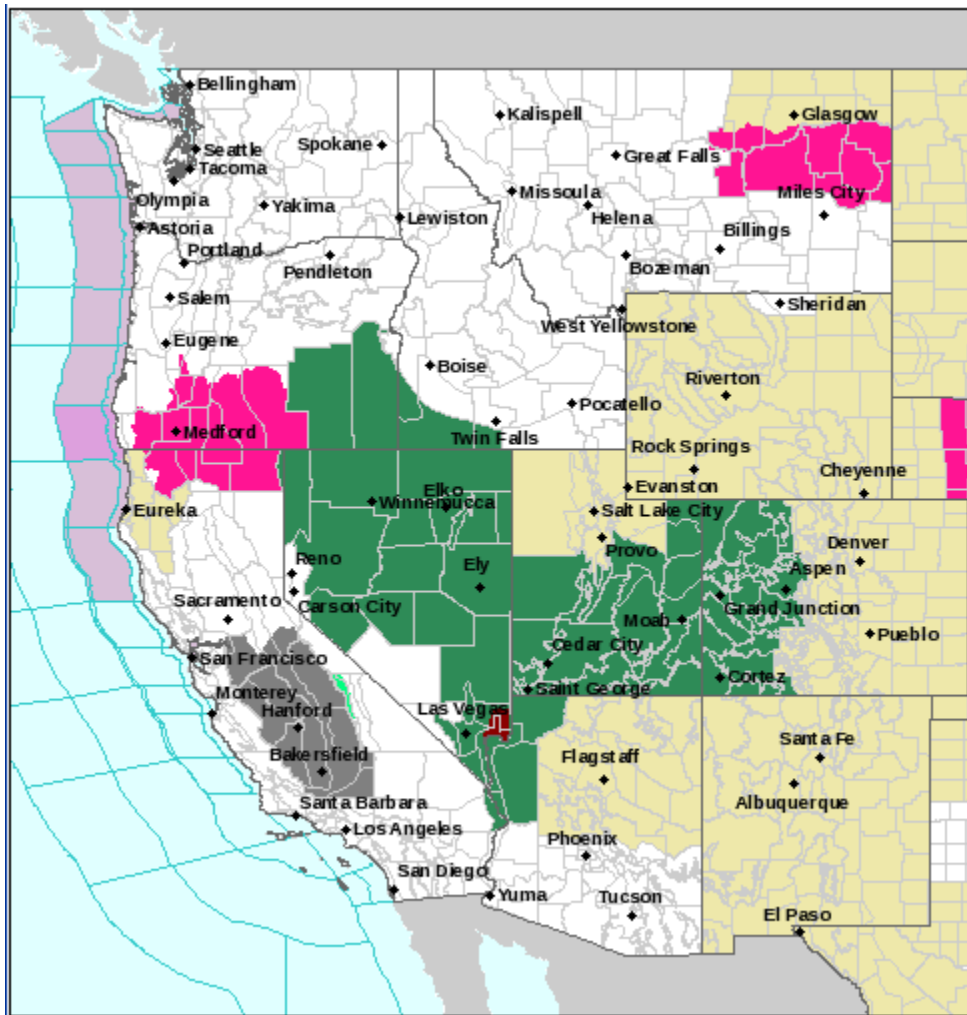

The low pressure system that's been along the coast is going to be very slow to move inland over the next few days, so we will continue to have thunderstorms into Wednesday, including a few overnight possibly. The most thunderstorm-favored areas are now in the very northwest corner of the state in addition to the rest of our northern and eastern areas. New fire starts will continue even though most thunderstorms will be on the wet side now. There will be a slight chance of isolated thunderstorms developing over the NW mountains to as far south as around the Yolla Bollys today too. The marine layer appears to be relatively shallow this morning north of Cape Mendocino (~1000 ft) but about 2500 ft deep in the Bay Area, and afternoon onshore flow will bring cooler, more humid marine air inland to additional areas today. Higher pressure and a dry SW flow is anticipated for the weekend into next week with temperatures rising from the near normal conditions now to well above normal for the weekend and certainly next week as a very strong high develops and lingers over the North Ops region then.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

The subtropical air-mass that was over the region yesterday will be replaced with drier air in the coming days. This means that there will still be isolated thunderstorms across the mountains and deserts this afternoon, but after today, no convection is expected anywhere in the Geographic Area for the remainder of the work week. Night and morning low clouds and fog will continue across the coastal areas most days this week. High temperatures today will be in the upper 70s to the 80s in the mountains, upper 80s to the 90s in the valleys, and near 102 across the lower and eastern deserts. Humidity values will be above 20%, and winds will be variable 5 to 15 mph, except strong and gusty in and near thunderstorms. Starting Wednesday, high pressure over the Four Corners region will slowly expand westward which will result in a gradual warming and drying trend throughout the local district for the latter half of the work week. Daytime highs Thursday and Friday will approach the century mark across most of the inland valleys and humidity values are expected to fall into the teens. The warmer and drier weather may be short-lived however as another surge of monsoon moisture is expected to push into the region later in the weekend and into early next week resulting in cooler and more humid conditions. Scattered thunderstorms will again be possible over the mountains and deserts starting Sunday.
